Red Head, Tap-Dancer

By Harry C. Walker

CHAPTER VIII

"You men are pretty much alike," Elaine said, with a trace of bitterness. "We have our points," he chided her gently.

"I'm not ready to be buried back there and chained down for life by a family."

"So you're determined to remain here and look for work?"

"Of course. I suppose you think I should go right back home."

"After a week or two in which to see some of the sights, yes," he readily admitted. "Go back to your job and sweeten."

"I won't go back. I have money enough to stay here for some time. Other girls find work here. I can, too. I've had a good training and a year of actual office experience."

"Humm," said Duncan. "Now that you've stated clearly that you intend to remain, I'll say that I think you will make good here at something. I believe you have what it takes to be successful. I've watched the struggles of many a girl in this city and I think I'm a fair judge at picking those that should come through."

"I hope you really mean that you're not saying it just to make me overconfident and conceited, are you? So I'll be easily discouraged by apparent failure?"

"I meant all I said," he consoled her, lighting his third cigarette since sitting down. "Let's decide now what you're to do next."

"I intend to go to a hotel for tonight," said Elaine. "Then look for a permanent rent in the morning."

For some time Duncan smoked in silence and studied the face of the Red Head. The unusual beauty of this innocent-looking girl impressed him forcefully and caused to come to life within him a desire to watch over her and guide her safely by the many pitfalls lying on the path of the unwary and trusting.

"Miss Winton," he began with sudden decision, "I have a daughter around here, and I want you to like you and her to be my friends. I want you to stay with us for a time, with my wife and daughter and myself, at our apartment up in the east hundred-and-forties. We have plenty of room for you and I think it would do you good to be associated with someone from outside the city. Plainly speaking, I'm asking you to be our guest, at least until you find work and are able to take care of yourself. All right. I don't want to be a bother to anyone."

Duncan declared she wouldn't be a bother, and persisted until she finally agreed to do as he proposed. Then they left the cafe and emerged upon the street teeming with humanity that is Broadway. The girl called a halt and gazed up and down the famous thoroughfare as far as she could see, her eyes excited, sparkling, her lips parted in ecstasy.

"All my life," she breathed, "I've dreamed of setting foot on this street. Today that dream has come true. Duncan, close beside her with the traveling cases in his hands, shook his head and smiled with understanding.

"You young girls certainly get a kick out of it, don't you? You're thrilled so easily—and harmlessly."

He led her across the street and ushered her down a subway entrance. As they were near to the bottom of the first flight of steps, descending side by side, a shadow appeared at the entrance behind them and a revolver shot upset the even roar of the city. Elaine saw a tongue of blue leap on the floor of the subway, and she felt the impact of a bullet being flattened against the wall before them. Strangely unafraid, she turned quickly and caught a fleeting glimpse of the face of the man who fired. He was vaguely familiar, as though it had sometimes been registered on her mind. But at that moment and for a long time after she was at a loss to place the face in her memory, could not remember what it was that of someone she had met that day or years ago.

Duncan dropped the traveling cases instinctively as the bullet flicked his sleeve, whirled like a cat and leaped up the stairs, right hand tugging at something under the left arm pit. At the entrance he paused just outside the door, and glared swiftly about with set jaw and deadly eyes. But he saw nothing to cause him to show his gun, and as no one in the staring populace proceeded to act suspiciously, he quickly descended the steps and was out of the subway in a flash.

"You're a cool one, not to scream or throw a fit of some kind," he told her in frank admiration, catching up the baggage he had dropped and hurrying her down another short flight of steel-capped steps.

"I wasn't frightened, somehow," she said. "I don't understand why."

"Perhaps you subconsciously expected something like that to happen," he smiled grimly. "Thousands of people who watch the shootings we have here think guns are popping on every corner."

"What did that shot? You must have an idea."

Duncan bit his lip and scowled darkly ahead.

"I think this man Burke, who picked you up before I did could tell me who is responsible for my perforated sleeve. Some of friends evidently were watching us and didn't like the idea of my walking with you. They may think you know something that might be mentioned to me. Are you sure, now, that there is nothing more I should know?"

"I can think of nothing more," she replied, trying to recall everything she had said. "But I caught a little glimpse of the man who shot at you."

"You did? He looked like I didn't see a thing of him. Think hard, now."

"I can't describe him. I got only a flash of the side of his face. But seeing that much made me think of someone I've seen somewhere, sometime. Who it was or where I have seen him, I cannot say. It's way in the back of my mind and I can't seem to bring it out. But it will come out sometime, I feel sure."

"If it ever comes to you who he is, be sure and let me know the quickest way possible," requested Duncan, a little disappointed but still hopeful. "It might prove to be the best thing that has happened to me. I've been trying to work out for two whole years."

Now they reached the last level and the Red Head had her first view of the city. She directed her attention to the station. People milled swiftly by her on every side. There was the tinkle of many coins being dropped in slots and the loud clink, clink, clink of numerous whirling turbines letting people through one by one. A rapidly approaching car drowned conversation and a packed train flashed to a halt beyond rows of pillars set in line along a wide road bed. Duncan directed her to turn to the left, to follow him through and sought out one of the less crowded spots on the platform.

"What a lot of people," marveled the girl.

"Yes. Millions use the subway every week. It is swift and cheap."

"What's the strange odor?"

"Probably comes from metal dust ground from the rails by the car wheels. You won't notice it after a few trips. An expression of grave concern clouded the face of the little Red Head. She looked up at Duncan and asked, "Won't it be dangerous for you to travel about the city now? If this gang shoots at you when you're with someone, they'll surely be laying for you when you go out alone. I'm awfully sorry that I was the cause of your narrow escape."

"You probably wasn't, so forget it. And don't tell my wife or my daughter about what happened. They worry enough about me now. It was only two weeks ago that someone tried to exterminate me in Portland, and I haven't an idea as to who might be. I'm afraid he's some supposedly respectable business man, and if this is, it will be hard to sift him out. But I hope to be in the attempt."
